Dalai Lama's Cottage Grove connection

Among the rarest of the most influential people in the world to speak at SkiTime’s Winter Olympic Games on May 23 is a woman virtually unknown beyond her native Cottage Grove. So, too, is Lady Jangchup Palmo, commonly known as "Jangchupma," which means "Mother of the World" in Tibetan.

Jangchupma, who was in attendance on this Thursday afternoon, often sitios with her sister, who was the world’s foremost meditation master. She is also sitting on the floor for this event to support her sister, who has been at the forefront of Buddhist teachings.

Next to her sit two more women, Jigme Rinpoche and Chogyam Trungpa, also seated on the floor, offering traditional Tibetan prayers.

According to The Register-Guard, there is no information about the Dalai Lama's visit to the town beyond what is publicly available.

For many women who have survived sexual assault, the trauma doesn’t begin and end with the assaulted.

In addition to the women being assaulted, their friends, family members, athletic teams and similar groups can be further psychological harm when they fail to support the woman.

The study suggests that women who experience betrayal are more likely to feel a sense of responsibility and guilt.

Betrayal is a topic that has been scrutinized in recent years, with more women sharing their stories.

In the fall of 2019, the researchers conducted a survey of women, with an average age of 26, who had experienced such assault.

Out of those who were surveyed, 60 percent reported feeling a sense of guilt and betrayal.

The study concludes that the trauma doesn’t begin and end with the assaulted.
